The difference between the two cases is smaller than 1.9 fm^{-3} . The energy density and pressures reach values up to 20 MeV fm^{-3} and 4 MeV fm^{-3} , respectively. We have also calculated the total energy and entropy of the superheavy nucleus $Z=119$ and $A \approx 2262$. For the considered stellar matter case, the total energy and entropy are 5.87 MeV and 4.02 fm^{-2} per baryon, respectively. Thus, the entropy per baryon for the superheavy nucleus is $\sim 13\%$ smaller than the value calculated for ^{12}C and 22% larger than the value for cold neutron matter. The paper is organized as follows. In the next section we describe the model and discuss the results of the calculations. In Section [sec:results] we present the results for the mass and charge radii of superheavy nuclei, as well as the average nuclear potential. In Section [sec:shell] we calculate the superheavy shell effects. In Section [sec:liquid] we present the results of the calculations for the nuclear matter case of cold neutron matter and neutron-star f678ea9f9e
